If I want to do that, I'll use GarageBand. I'm looking for the developer's view of the art, not the artist's. I have numerous albums on my hard drive with very different programming layouts and very different art styles. The software can't distinguish that for me. I've met a number of guitarists in my life, and although I think recording is a wonderful art, I don't want to hear how any of them cut and shape my sounds, I just want to hear them. They have a voice of their own, and I trust them to bring it forth. How I cut my sounds depends on what kind of music I'm playing and what the song demands. I haven't thought about it. I don't feel as if I have the need to explain this. I was out of town over the holiday season, so I didn't have access to my main audio interface. I had to pull up a second audio interface and plug in some basic stuff like the effects and a compressor. Some are included with the language itself, and others are split between the core and modules that are shipped with it. We've created this list of additions for Perl developers. And to each of them we have assigned either one or more of these flags: Optional: These modules are either in the standard distribution of Perl or easily obtainable from CPAN and don't require any special installation. Feasible with the installed Perl: With a few exceptions, these modules can be installed and run with any module installation system on the platform you're supporting. Required for Perl: These modules provide a more robust foundation for your Perl development than a bare installation of Perl, but can be installed by hand for your own use. Required: These modules have significant benefits if you're writing in Perl, but you need to have your platform under your control before you can use them. Feasible on all supported platforms: These modules are not platform-specific, and can be installed on all supported platforms. For the most part, these modules are available on all supported platforms.
